

The process of hate creation

Direct incitement of violence against minority has been greatly reduced since the defeat of the Islamic state. However indirect incitement of violence is much more common and much more serious.

Calls for intolerance and segregation will eventually lead to hate and hate will eventually lead to violence which can be sparked by any trivial events. Repeating the message of intolerance over years in schools, mosques, social clubs, societies and social media would lead to segregation and exclusion and dehumanisation of the minorities which would eventually end up in violence.

Repeating the message of high moral standards of the Muslim believers and the immorality of the non Muslim infidels would create a society of us and them. Us are the morally superior believers and them are the infidels who have no honour or integrity. Such hate created by segregation and exclusion has been the cause of wide spread violence against Christian minorities in the Middle East even in absence of any direct call for violence. We have seen similar mechanism in the West. At the time of Islamic state about 40% of them came from the west, many of them born and educated in the West from middle class and affluent families however they ended up committing extreme degree of violence against their own western countries for the same reasons.

The same mechanism of hate creation has also caused violence against Muslim minorities as it happened in India and Myanmar.

It is important to be aware of the great potential of violence in the indirect incitement hidden in the message of intolerance and reluctance of integration in education and social media.
