

Dr Réka Brigitta Szaniszló is a Senior Lecturer at the Faculty of Law and Political Sciences of the University of Szeged (SZTE), Hungary, and an international expert at the university's Francophone University Centre. She teaches across several programmes in Hungarian, English, and French, focusing on geopolitics, intercultural communication, and the analysis of international disputes. Her academic and professional work is driven by a commitment to human rights, minority protection, and social responsibility in international relations. She earned her BA and MA in International Studies with honours, and completed her PhD summa cum laude in 2024, researching how diasporas formed through international student migration influence inter-state relations, with a special focus on the Vietnamese community in Hungary. Dr Szaniszló's current research explores human rights violations in the digital space, particularly on social media platforms, where issues of free expression, discrimination, and accountability increasingly intersect. She is passionate about understanding how digital governance frameworks can both protect and endanger vulnerable communities online. She has presented her work at international conferences such as the ECPR Annual Conference, the Nordic Migration Conference, and Fórum de Migrações in Rio de Janeiro, and has contributed to several international collaborations, including IMISCOE, EUGLOH, and MITRA. Since 2025, Dr Szaniszló has been a member of the Minority Rights Solidarity Network, where she seeks to strengthen the dialogue between academia and advocacy in the defence of minority rights.
